BUILDING INDEPENDENCE IN COLLEGE-AGED KIDS

By: Sydney Samuelson, Juab County USU Extension Intern

The move to college is like standing on the end of the high dive. Students are assured that once they're in the water life is great, but the fall still seems incredibly scary. Watching a child take this leap can be equally terrifying for the parents. As much as they might want to, the parents can't build a ladder for their child to safely climb down.

Unless the soon-to-be college student knows the proper way to land into their university experience, it could be painful. The secret to a successful dive? Independence.

Here are a few tips to build independence in students about to leave for college:

Building independence tip #1: Help students develop skills they'll need in college.

By the time they head to college, students have probably cooked a meal and changed a load of laundry. However, this doesn't mean they are ready to live on their own. There are many household chores and skills that will be essential. Becoming more capable in these areas is a great way to prepare for life outside of the home.

Skills can include anything from cleaning bathrooms to managing finance. Parents should invite their children to participate in projects, ask questions, and be involved, rather than doing the tasks for them. This is one of the best ways for college students to master important skills. ("College Students" 2020)

Building independence tip #2: Let your student do all the talking with the college.

Communication skills are vital to being independent. A great way for students to expand this talent is by communicating with their college. By having all the talking happen between the college and the student themselves, students will learn to speak up and problem solve without relying on their parents.

Of course, this doesn't mean parents can't help! But parents should guide their children towards a solution instead of solving problems for them.

Building independence tip #3: Give them the reins now (while they're on a relatively safe horse).

Moving out to college is a whirlwind of firsts for students. This will likely be the first time they'll live away from home, create a budget, set schedules, and be solely responsible for their academics. Letting students take more responsibility will not only prepare them for handling even more later, but it will lighten the parents' workload.

Giving them opportunities to make decisions and live with the consequences at home creates a place to practice in a safer environment. (Emerson, 2019)

Building independence tip #4: Make sure they know that most colleges have great support systems.

Being independent doesn't mean you can't ask for help! Colleges are aware that the best way for their students to learn is to help them feel safe and at home. Students should know where to find the resources available to them at their college. There will be everything from libraries and mental health counselors, to medical care and tutoring. Let them know that there is no shame in needing help, and their experience will be much easier if they find the help they need.

Building independence tip #5: Encourage students to get involved socially at college.

Part of independence is finding new people to guide you in life. In college, there are so many opportunities for new friends. Most colleges and universities have at least one activity a week- but usually closer to one a day. There are also lots of clubs where students can expand their horizons, and just have fun! Besides, being social helps prepare students for life after school. Navigating relationships and boundaries is another crucial skill. "Closely related to relationship building is the skill of setting appropriate boundaries. Knowing how and when to say "no" in an appropriate but firm way to people ranging from a boss to a friend to a romantic partner can be challenging to newly-minted adults who are used to seeing anyone older as an authority figure, but it's important in establishing both good relationships and a healthy balance between needs, desires, and obligations." (Rubin, 2019)

College-aged kids have a unique opportunity to go out into the world and learn how to be on their own. It can seem overwhelming, but with proper preparation and skills, they can hit the water with a perfect score.
